Dear Lieutenant Governor Casey Cagle,

The American Conservative Union Foundation works to educate Americans on a number of important issues, including the need for criminal justice reform. When it comes to improving the justice system, public safety must always come first. Within the context of criminal justice reform, we work to hold people and government agencies accountable, ensure fiscal responsibility, and maintain principles of limited government. ACUF also endeavors to advance human dignity, as we believe every life has value and meaning.

Under Governor Deal's leadership, Georgia has been on the cutting edge of criminal justice policy and the results are undisputed. Georgia's taxpayers have enjoyed better public safety outcomes at a reduced cost. We commend those in the law enforcement, legal, and public policy communities who have worked with the Governor over the past seven years to make Georgia a better place to live. As you consider how to continue to improve the state's criminal justice system, we urge you to focus on the plight of incarcerated women.

Nationally, women are the fastest growing segment of the prison population and face difficult challenges when incarcerated. As such, we urge you to address the following issues:

- Helping to Maintain Family Bonds. Women tend to be primary caregivers of young children. With 80% of women incarcerated being mothers, keeping children close makes perfect sense. There is no stronger bond than a mother's love for her child. And in all but a few cases, that bond isn't severed, even by a committing a crime. Unfortunately, many mothers are needlessly incarcerated hundreds of miles from their families, making it difficult or financially impossible for their children to visit and stay connected. Such placements should only be made as a last resort. Technology can also be leveraged and visitation policies modified to help maintain that unique bond between mothers and their children.

Addressing such considerations is not being "soft on crime." Other states around the country have seen a dramatic drop in misconduct cases in facilities where women are permitted to have extended contact with their minor children. These policies improve the safety of prison employees as well as other inmates. Maintaining the parent-child bond also strengthens families, which directly correlates with the likelihood of children of incarcerated parents drifting into crime themselves.

- Shackling of Pregnant Women. We are also concerned about the heinous practice of shackling pregnant women. Doing so serves little security purpose, as a woman in labor is not going to outrun her guards. But according to the American College of Obstetricians and Gynecologists, shackling pregnant women endangers the child.

- Limiting Circumstances Where Male Guards Can Observe Female Inmates in a State of Undress. With an epidemic of sexual assault and rape of women in prison, the government has a duty to protect those it holds behind bars. Reasonable rules can be put in place to limit access by male prison guards to areas where women may be in a state of undress. If there is a need to observe female inmates undressed, female guards should do so whenever possible. Of course, the safety and/or security needs take priority. But if a male guard has a need to be in changing rooms, bathrooms or showers, the filing of a report documenting the need to do so should be required.
- Access to Basic Feminine Hygiene Products. For incarcerated women without resources, prison labor is often the only source of funds. Thus, poor women often have to choose between using prison labor wages to call home to maintain family ties, or purchase hygiene products. In such circumstances, ACUF believes that women who qualify for subsidized postage should also be provided with reasonable access to feminine hygiene products.

The American Conservative Union Foundation recognizes that for some, our recommendations represent a paradigm shift. But as you consider legislation in this session, we urge you to address these and related issues to ensure that every woman in Georgia's prisons system is accorded basic human dignity.
